AN EXPLANATION.

This book is not only an introduction to the history of the second battalion of the Gordon Highlanders—explaining the ducal influence in raising the regiment more minutely than has yet been attempted; but it also marks the penultimate instalment by the present writer to materials for a full history of the military contribution of the north-east of Scotland to the nation.

My interest in the subject was first roused by assisting my father to write a series of articles for the (Dundee) "Weekly News," entitled "Historic Scenes in Aberdeenshire," appearing weekly from April 21, 1883, to July 11, 1885. Then, solely on my own account, I contributed ten purely military sketches, ranging from 1308 to 1802, in a series of 101 articles called "Quaint Quests in Queer Corners," which appeared in "Bon-Accord" between April 30, 1887, and June 8, 1889, these including my first note on Gordon history, namely, a sketch of Lord George Gordon, who fell at the battle of Alford in 1645 (March 17, 1888). My interest was rekindled by the achievement of the Gordons at Dargai, October, 1907, and has practically been continuous ever since.

I have published articles on various aspects of the question in many journals. As these will probably not be reprinted in book form, I inventory them chronologically, in case some other writer may wish to refer to them in writing a military history of the north-east of Scotland:—

The naval and military influence of men of the name of Gordon themselves has been minutely done by Mrs. Skelton and the present writer in GORDONS UNDER ARMS, 1912, (pp. lxvi., 596) for the New Spalding Club, and the present volume purposely matches it in shape.

I have to thank his Grace the Duke of Richmond and Gordon, K.G., for the opportunity of examining at leisure his unique set of military documents now preserved at Gordon Castle; Dr John Milne, Aberdeen, for the immense labour in transcribing the Muster Roll of 1794, now at Castlehill Barracks, Aberdeen; M. Georges Scott, Paris, for the privilege of reproducing his picture of an old Gordon Highlander; and last of all to Mr James Grant, Mr John Yeats, and the Banffshire Field Club for the interest they have taken in the production of this book.

THE RAISING OF THE GORDON HIGHLANDERS

WITH the exception of the Black Watch and the Scots Greys, it may be questioned whether any British regiment has had more written about it, or holds a higher place in the affections of the people than the Gordon Highlanders. Why this should be so it is not my purpose to decide; but the fact remains that something like a saga has risen round the Gordons. Now a saga is never very rational; it certainly dislikes definitiveness; and though much has been written about the Gordon Highlanders, the origins of the regiment have been much overlooked. Richard Cannon set the ball rolling in 1851 by his official history, a dry War Office publication. Popular accounts have been done by Mr James Cromb (1894) and Mr James Milne (1898), while the full dress regimental history of Colonel Greenhill Gardyne (1901-3), though running into 970 octavo pages, skips over the beginnings of the corps with a light heart. This is all the more curious because it happens that the early records possessed by the regiment at headquarters are unusually complete, and the archives of the Duke of Richmond and Gordon at Gordon Castle are available. It would seem, however, that they had not been touched by any historian till His Grace was good enough to permit the present writer to examine them.

The 100th Regiment, as it was originally numbered, was the fourth big contingent of troops raised for the Government, over a period of nearly forty years (1759-94), by Alexander, 4th Duke of Gordon. The military activity of his Grace was conditioned by two main facts: first, the desire of his wise mother (herself a Gordon by birth) to wipe out the stigma of Jacobitism which had made his family more than suspect; secondly, the straits to which the country was reduced by the necessity of holding her own and extending her own all over the world. The regiments he raised marked regular crises in this great struggle for life :—

1759-65—89th Regiment	Conquest of India begins, 1757. Canada gained from France, 1763.
1778-83—Northern Fencibles	American war, 1775-1781.
1793-96—Northern Fencibles 1794 —Gordon Highlanders	First coalition against France, 1792

The raising of the Gordons was the most difficult task that the Duke undertook, because his first three regiments were all of the militia type, raised for a limited period and really for home service. The Gordons were raised as a regular regiment of the line, which men were shy of joining, all the more as the countryside had been drained dry by half a century of vigorous and often unscrupulous recruiting. At first, the whole adventure possessed all the charm of novelty. The levy of 1759 had been a comparatively easy matter, for the Duke was a fatherless boy of thirteen, and got the full benefits of orphanism and of the removal of the years of severe repression which followed Culloden. But in the ensuing half century much had occurred. Men came back to their native heath disillusioned. The glory of war had become a little dusty at the hem. The rivalry of contending recruiters had made them more demandful. The dislike of foreign service had increased, and one northern regiment, the Atholl Highlanders, commanded by Charles Gordon, the laird of Sheelagreen, had, in 1783, clearly demonstrated, with the approval of Parliament and the public, the right of Fencibles to go abroad, just as the Black Watch had done, but with fatal consequences, in 1743.

The Duke's fourth and final effort, difficult as it was, received a great fillip from the fact that the regiment was raised not only in face of the menace of France, but also because it was to be commanded by his heir, the handsome and popular Marquis of Huntly, and because the equally popular Duchess and her daughters took the warmest interest in the corps, even if she did not actually kiss the recruits as tradition maintains and will not abandon in face of any evidence to the contrary.

Young as he was (he was only four and twenty), the merry Marquis was not without experience. He had begun his career (Sept. 4, 1790) in the 35th Regiment, of which his brother-in-law, the future Duke of Richmond, was colonel. In the following month he had raised an Independent Company for the Black Watch. In 1792, he joined the 3rd, now the Scots, Guards, and fought with them in Flanders. His father was "a little vexed about his going to Holland," and John Stuart, of Pittyoulish, writing in March, 1793, shared the same feeling—"not that I wou'd be affraid of his lordship if 20,000 well disciplined Highlanders was about him." Short of being a King and a Croesus, it was not possible for the Duke to raise anything approaching 20,000 men, but he did the next best thing: he raised a regiment of regulars for his boy.

The official proposal to the Duke of Gordon is in the following terms:—

ST. JAMES' SQUARE,
24th January, 1794

My Lord,—The King, having been pleased to approve of the raising of some regiments in N. Britain agreeably to the plan of Lord Seaforth's in the last war, I beg the favour to know if it will be agreeable to Your Grace to raise a regiment of 1000 men, the regiment having a Lieut.-Colonel Commandant and two Majors, the two Majors appointed by the King, and leaving to Your Grace the recommendation of the other officers. The plan of the particulars shall be transmitted immediately to Your Grace if it meets with your accepting the offer.—I have the honour to be, my Lord, Your Grace's most humble and most obedient Servant,

AMHERST.

In his reply to Lord Amherst (who had been Commander-in-Chief since 1788), His Grace wrote from Gordon Castle, February 2, 1794:—

My Lord,—I had not the honour to receive Your Lordship's letter of the 24th of last month till yesterday owing to the great fall of snow which retarded the course of the post for several days. Upon every former occasion it made me very happy to prove my zealous attachment to the King by promoting his wishes as far as lay in my power, and I think it my duty, more particularly on the present emergency, to comply with His Majesty's pleasure by accepting of the offer he has made me, and I shall do my utmost endeavours to assist Lord Huntly in raising the regiment, to whom I wish the command to be given. He will set out for London as soon as the roads are passable for a carriage, in order to settle the terms with Your Lordship, of which I am ignorant, but I trust they will be such as not to put me to great expense on account of my circumstances, which really will not admit of it.

The Letter of Service for the raising of the regiment was sent from the War Office, February 10, 1794, by Sir George Yonge, Secretary for War, the same day on which the mandate for the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders was issued:—

My Lord,—I am commanded to acquaint you that His Majesty approves of your Grace's offer of raising a Regiment of Foot to be completed within three months upon the following conditions:—

The Corps to consist of one company of Grenadiers, one of Light Infantry, and eight Battalion Companies.

The Grenadier Company is to consist of one captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, five corporals, two drummers, two fifers, and 95 privates.

The Light Infantry of one captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, two drummers, and 95 privates.

And each Battalion Company of one captain, two lieutenants, one ensign, four sergeants, five corporals, two drummers, and 95 privates;

Together with the usual staff officers, and with a serjeant major, and quartermaster serjeant, exclusive of the serjeants above specified. The captain lieutenant is (as usual) included in the number of lieutenants above mentioned.

The corps is to have three field officers, each with a company; their respective ranks to be determined by the rank of the officer whom your Grace shall recommend for the command thereof. If the person so recommended for the command is not at present in the army, he will be allowed temporary rank during the continuance of the regiment on the establishment but will not be entitled to half pay on its reduction.

His Majesty leaves to your Grace the nomination of all the officers, being such as are well affected to his Majesty, and most likely by their interest and connections to assist in raising the corps without delay; who, if they meet with his Royal approbation, may be assured they shall have commissions as soon as the regiment is completed.

The officers, if taken from the half pay, are to serve in their present ranks; if full pay, with one step of promotion. The gentlemen named for ensigncies are not to be under sixteen years of age. The quartermaster is not to be proposed for any other commission.

In case the corps shall be reduced after it has been established, the officers will be entitled to half pay.

The pay of the officers is to commence from the dates of their commissions: and that of the non-commissioned officers and private men from the dates of their attestations.

Levy money will be allowed to Your Grace in aid of this levy at the rate of five guineas per man for 1064 men.

The recruits are to be engaged without limitation as to the period or place of their service.

None are to be enlisted under five feet four inches, nor under 18 years or above 35. Growing lads from 16 to 18, at five feet three inches will not be rejected.

The non-commissioned officers and privates are to be inspected by a general officer, who will reject all such as are unfit for service, or not enlisted in conformity with the terms of this Letter.

His Majesty consents that on a reduction the Regiment shall, if it be desired, be disbanded in that part of the country where it was raised.

In the execution of this service, I take leave to assure Your Grace of every assistance which my office can afford.

The first important duty was to allot commissions, and the difficulty was not to get officers but to winnow them, for the applications were far in excess of the vacancies. Indeed, in November, 1793, that is to say, three months before the raising of the regiment was officially authorised, thirty applications for commissions were sent in. The following is a list of all the disappointed applicants for the first allotted commissions:—

Majors—Captain Baillie, brother-in-law of Cosmo Gordon of Cluny. Captain Fraser of Fraserfield. Captain John Gordon-Cuming of Pitlurg, then serving in the Northern Fencibles. Major Urquhart, late of the 14th Regiment, brother of the laird of Craigston.

Captains—Lieut. Forsyth, 72nd Regiment. Lieut. Horn and Lieut. Houston, both of the 37th. Lieut. Macdonald of Keppoch, suggested by Tod, one of the Duke's factors. Lieut. Lewis Macdonald, brother of Glengarry. Alexander Mackay, of the Reay family. Lieut. Ewan

Digitized by Google

Macpherson of Coullachie. Lieut. Hugh Macpherson of Inverhall, who was in the Northern Fencibles. Lieut. John Mercer, 63rd Regiment. Lieut. Stuart of Urard, from Atholl. Mr Seton, Rumgay, Fife.

Captain Lieut.—Lieut. John Gordon, Tombae, afterwards court-martialled for alleged defalcations in the West Indies. Captain J. Grant, Rippachy.

Lieutenants—William Gordon, in Minmore. Mr Macdonald, yr. of Achbriachlan. Ensign Alexander Stewart, of the 79th Regiment.

Ensigns—Sergeant Innes, Glenlivet, of the Northern Fencibles. Mr Ray, at Sherifftown.

Surgeons—Patrick Mushet. Alexander Reid.

Chaplains—Rev. James Gordon, Bellie, for his son. Rev. George Gordon, Aberdeen. Mr Grant, Kirkmichael. Mr Grant, Laggan. Rev. Thomas Ross, Kilmonivaig.

Some of the applications make curious reading. For instance, Duncan Stewart wrote from Belfast, on February 8, to the Duke of Gordon:—

> My Lord,—Coming to this place with two of my sons in the 79th Regiment, the Quarter-master department being in their charge, they were both young and unacquainted, [and] I had to attend them to see the regiment clothed and accoutred: and seeing here in the public papers that Your Grace was to raise a regiment, I have presumed to address and solicit your Grace for a lieutenancy for one of them in your regiment, which I hope is to be commanded by Lord Huntly. I will engage to make men for the step. It's most likely your Grace may not recollect me, tho' I am one of your Lochaber tenants and a feuar of Gordonsburgh. Mr Tod, the factor, I have wrote to him on this business. He will inform your Grace respecting me.

On February 10, 1794, an application was made by the Rev. George Gordon, Aberdeen, for the Chaplaincy:—

> Perhaps I am wrong, but it strikes me that my having been the Marquis's first preceptor, if it does not give me some sort of natural claim for the Chaplaincy, at least furnishes an excuse for my thinking of it.

Gordon had to wait nine years for a post, being appointed chaplain to

Digitized by Google

Fort George, December 7, 1803. Three of his sons became surgeons in the H.E.I.C., and a fourth was in the artillery.

On March 4, the Rev. William Gordon, Urquhart, applied for the chaplaincy (which he got) :—"I can assure you that independent of the emoluments it would much gratify my pride to be my young Chief's chaplain." He came of military stock, for his uncle James was a lieutenant-colonel in the Bengal army, and was killed at Bijaigarh in 1800; his twin brother, Captain John Gordon in Laggan, had been in the Northern Fencibles; his son, William, who died in 1881, was an army surgeon; two of his grandsons were in the army; and a great grandson is now in the Indian army.

Still another Gordon was most pertinacious. This was John Gordon, Coynachie, who had entered the Northern Fencibles in 1778. Coynachie gave two sons (including General John Gordon, Culdrain) and four grandsons (including General Cosmo Gordon, Culdrain) to the services. On February 16, he wrote to the Duke :—

> My Lord Duke,—When I had the honour of seeing your Grace at Gordon Castle the other week, I mentioned that I had made proposals to Lord Huntly for raising what number of men might be required for the Captain-Lieutenancy of his regiment, and, altho' his Lordship did not positively say that that was to be the appointment, yet he was pleased to say that I should be in his regiment in some line or other. As the raising of the regiment must be an expensive undertaking, if your Grace and Lord Huntly would trust me with the paymastership I would cheerfully do the business for one half of the emoluments that might arise from the office. I cannot pretend to be a good accountant, but shall be answerable for the accounts of the regiment being kept exact, and I am certain that I would have his lordship's interest in view as [well as] any other that can be appointed.

Next day, on February 17, he wrote from Tullich, where he had been "holding forth in strong terms for recruiting" :—

> I find there will be many applications for commissions, but his Grace would need to be careful in not appointing too many in one neighbourhood, because if they engaged for me they will go to loggerheads and spoil the recruiting.
> It would be highly necessary that I knew if I was to be appointed : I cannot recruit with success or courage if not principally concerned, and being so much cut up at the last business makes my influence with the young lads of less consequence. If my finances would answer, I would not be the least affraid to raise my proportion for a company, independent of subaltern, if the rank was allowed from half pay.

On March 14 he wrote to Menzies, the Duke's factotum, more freely :—

If there is nothing more for me but a lieutenancy, it will be a damn'd poor appointment. However, I'm content : if I persist in going I will get much better terms from other colonels. I have enlisted about 16 men, but I'm in an awkward situation with some of them. I subsist them, but has [sic] given very little of their bounty untill the Marquis approves or not. I have none half so bad as I see with other parties. If I don't go into the regiment, I will not insist on my own friends going, and has not attested them untill I'm certain, as I know they would not go with any other person whatever.

He was given the captain lieutenancy. "I therefore am certain," writes Huntly, on March 23, "he will do what he can." On June 24, Captain Finlason writes to Menzies :—

Our friend Coinachy was put in orders as paymaster. I certainly did say everything in his favours possible. I think well of him, and I was the more inclined to do him good offices that you joined and wished it. I shall be happy to give him all the instructions in my power. I went and ordered the proper books for him.

One of the successful applicants was Lieutenant Simon Macdonald of Morar from the half pay of the 76th Regiment. James Fraser of Gortuleg writes, February 15, to Charles Gordon of Braid soliciting a commission for Macdonald :—

[He] is in point of ffriends and connections extremely well calculated to raise a company : and it would be particularly agreeable to him to be promoted in any corps to be raised by the Marquis of Huntly, as his brother is a captain in the first Royals, and owes much to Lord Adam Gordon, both from his original introduction and promotion in that regiment. Independent of his own tribe, which are numerous, and his remaining property by no means inconsiderable, he is by intermarriage particularly connected with the Glengarry branches.

When it came to the rank and file, Huntly was confronted by precisely the same difficulties as his father had had to face in recruiting for the Northern Fencibles in 1778 and 1793—especially in the matter of a rival regiment and of bounties. In addition, the young Marquis was unable to be present in person at the early stages of the recruiting, for he had injured his leg at Gordon Castle, and was laid up at Edinburgh in Walker's Hotel, having apparently gone south for medical advice. His friends became so agitated that he seems to have thought to allay their fears by advertising in the Aberdeen Journal, March 23 :—

> Lord Huntly presents his respectful compliments to the gentlemen who have obligingly interested themselves in his regiment. He sincerely thanks them for their exertions, and flatters himself that he will soon be permitted by his physicians to go to the north, and to have the honour to co-operate with them in person. In the meantime he requests that the recruits already enlisted may be sent to the headquarters at Aberdeen, where Major Erskine is appointed to receive them.

Despite this placid assurance, however, Captain John Gordon, writing from Huntly, March 27, declared that it would "retard the recruiting amazingly." Captain Finlason, who had to face the difficulty in Aberdeen itself, where a rival regiment was being formed, felt the Marquis's non-appearance very keenly. In March he wrote to Menzies, "I should not be surprised if the Prince of W., etc., etc., have him by the arm yet." As late as May 17, Finlason writes again to Menzies :—

> Good God, why will he not come and be the Lion in his own cause? I wish to God I was stopped and officers appeared. It does not answer for me (not an officer in the regiment) to carry on such an oppositional business. Unsupported, too, is dreadful. I have not even a serjeant to keep my irregulars in order.

These letters prove that the power of a personality was still of value, despite the fact that the spirit of clanship had largely died out.

Even more serious than the Marquis's prolonged absence was the raising of another regiment in Aberdeenshire, namely, the 109th, for which Letters of Service were granted to Colonel Alexander Hay, of Rannes, on April 4, 1794, within a few weeks of the mandate to the Duke. The keenness of the rivalry was strikingly shown by Hay's adopting the name "The Aberdeenshire Regiment," which Finlason had suggested to the Duke (March 1) as the name which should be adopted by his Grace's corps. On March 11, Finlason reports that Hay "is to assume the name of the Aberdeen Regiment. I once hinted that to your graceful Marquis." Next day he writes to Menzies:—"The Aberdeen Regiment will be upon us, and we should get strong before they start." So keenly did the Duke's supporters feel on the point that Finlason sent Professor Patrick Copland of Marischal College to remonstrate with the Lord Provost on the preference shown by the Town Council to Hay's corps. Copland reported:—

> I told him that whatever name might be given to Colonel Hay's regiment, the Marquis was surely the one with which the Town of Aberdeen would be most connected. I at length learned the truth of the matter: which is, that Hay's friends have strongly urged some of their connexions in the Council to accept of a sum of money privately to be given in their name as a bounty. I took the liberty of saying that if this was the case, I was certain the Magistrates would never be guilty of such meanness as thus to impose on the public. He agreed that they ought not, and promised that if it was again brought forward (which he believed it would) he should certainly oppose it and he hoped successfully. . . . The Provost told me besides that he and the Magistrates had been strongly urged by the Colonel's friends to sign a letter they had drawn out, recommending him in the warmest terms to Mr Allardyce as under the patronage of the town, and approving of his regiment being named as you mention. This has been refused, has been altered and again presented I think twice; and to avoid being teazed longer, they have this afternoon [March 15] given him what one of the baillies called to me a "milk and water" letter, merely mentioning that from their regard to His Majestie's service, it would be agreeable to the magistrates if Mr Allardyce would give Coll. Hay any assistance which might have been in his power while in London. I hope, however, the Duchess will have secured Allardyce before the Colonel's arrival, which in the present case will not, I believe, be difficult because his friends and the colonel's in general are not on the same side of the question.

In all likelihood the Duke's corps would have been known as the Aberdeenshire Regiment but for Hay's intervention. The first time I have noted the name "The Gordon Highlanders," is in an account of June 17. The regiment was numbered the 100th till October 1798, when it became the 92nd.

The great crux of the situation, however, was the question of finance. The point is particularly interesting in the case of the Gordon Highlanders on account of the pretty story that the Duchess got the men by giving them a kiss and a guinea. The story, which made its first appearance in print in the early 'sixties of last century, has been told with a great air of verisimilitude in somewhat varying forms. Colonel Greenhill Gardyne is inclined to stand by the tradition, which he summarises thus (i., 14) :—

> She rode to the country fairs in Highland bonnet [now in possession of the 2nd Gordons] and regimental jacket (it was not unusual in those days of military enthusiasm for ladies to wear the uniform of their husbands' or brothers' regiments). It is told how she gave a kiss to the men she enlisted—a fee more valued than the coin by which it was accompanied, as in the case of a smart young farmer at Huntly market, who took the shilling and the kiss, and then paid "smart" [that is £1 which a recruit forfeited if he repented his bargain before being sworn in], saying, "A kiss from your Grace is well worth a pound note." Sometimes she is said to have placed a guinea between her lips. There was in a Highland village a young blacksmith remarkable for his strength and good looks. Recruiters for the Guards and Line had in vain tried to enlist him, but he could not resist her Grace! He took the kiss and the guinea; but to show it was not the gold that tempted him, he tossed the guinea among the crowd. [Colonel Greenhill Gardyne goes on to note that when a Gordon Highlander was wounded in battle a Highland comrade would say, "Och cha n'eil ach pog eile o'n Bhan Diuc," or, as an Aberdonian would facetiously put it—"Mind, lad, ye got a kiss o' the Duchess o' Gordon for that."]

A circumstantial looking testimony to the kiss-story is given by a correspondent, "G. T.," who, writing in the late Mrs Simpson's interesting "Souvenir of Sympathy," says—

> My grandmother, aged 97 years, told me, with her own mouth, that she stood one day beside the plainstones in the Old Square at Elgin and saw the Duchess ride up in search of men for her regiment, and seeing a fine young fellow standing in front of the old jail—which occupied the place which the water fountain now holds—she waved her hand for him to approach her, which he did, and after a little talk with him, she dismounted and approached him with a sovereign held between her teeth. The gallant lad wiped his mouth, and the next moment the coin was transferred and held between his teeth, she remarking—"You will get maha to-mo'o" (you will get mare to-morrow, or Mae to-mo'o). She could not pronounce the letter "r."

A variation of the story occurs in William Grant Stewart's "Lectures on the Mountains" (1860), and this seems to be the first appearance of the legend in print:—

In a crowded market at Tomintoul, dressed in Highland bonnets and feathers, tartan scarfs, short tartan petticoats and pantaloons, in a circle formed by their attendants, appeared some of those young, gay and lovely ladies [the Duchess's daughters], afterwards the consorts of ducal coronets; and danced with any young man willing to wear a cockade, to the music of the bagpipes; and at the end of each reel handed to each of their partners a guinea and a cockade, in the name of King George and Huntly. Candidates for the honour of a dance crowded around emulous for the next vacancy, and in spite of the remonstrances and lamentations of female friends, they bounded in rapid succession into the enchanting circle, going in as civilians and coming out as soldiers. At the end of the day the noble marquis and his fair assistants had reason to be satisfied with the day's sport—scores of young men, the finest of the Fair, having become stricken, proud, no doubt, come what might, they had been partners for once with "Nighean Duchd Gordon" (the Duke of Gordon's daughter).

The Duchess may, or may not, have kissed the men. Personally, I believe she did nothing of the kind; and there is contemporary proof positive that her eldest daughter, Lady Madelina Sinclair, not only did not do so, but was angry at the suggestion that she did, for her husband, Sir Robert Sinclair, writing from Fort George on June 22 about his recruiting experiences in Caithness, says:—

I met with great opposition from the Fencibles, but we conducted ourselves so as to put it out of their power to speak truths, that at last they were reduced to the necessity of saying something false, which was truly ridiculous, that Lady Madelina marched thro' Thurso in the filibeg and hose and enlisted men with a kiss and a guinea in her mouth—which she very properly at Lord Caithness's table, etc., made a very laughable joke of.

Not the least interesting point about this denial is this, that, while the story is still told of the Duchess by way of distinction, it was said of her daughter by way of disparagement. I am well aware that the regiment treasures the curious diced bonnet in which Her Grace is said to have gone forth on her recruiting expeditions. I am also aware that there is preserved at Gordon Castle a handsome flag (6 ft. 3 in. by 5 ft. 10 in.) said to have been made for Her Grace in the recruiting of the 2nd Battalion in 1803. Moreover, it is obvious, from the host of stories told about her, that the Duchess had just the temperament which could have carried off such a feat as kissing the recruits: but the fact remains that there is not a single reference in the scores of letters dealing with the recruiting to bear out the story, which, as we have seen, was denied of her daughter, bent on the same mission.

In any case it is certain that Her Grace could not have got a drummer, much less a full blown private, for a guinea, even if she had kissed him. Indeed, the experience of the Marquis in getting men was far more severe than anything his father had encountered. The latter had gone the length of three guineas for the Northern Fencibles in the previous year, but that was no good whatever in the case of the Gordons, for the simple reason that while soldiering in the Fencibles was a mere interlude in a man's career, it became his life-work in a regular regiment like the Gordons. The Government itself offered five guineas, but even that was not enough, and it had to be supplemented by the Marquis from the price of commissions. Cox and Greenwood, the army agents of Craig's Court, London, wrote about the point on February 11, 1794:—

> The terms of the Letter of Service are such as, with the produce of the appointment and the Bounty, to admit of £20 per man, and that at a very moderate calculation; but we think that no more than £15 ought to be allowed to the recruiting officer, and we should hope that the colonels raising the several corps will agree to this, as there must be service expences and contingencies which cannot otherwise be provided for.

On March 1, they condescended to figures, calculating, on the basis of other new regiments, that £22,850 could be raised from commissions, and £5,586 was due from Government, thus making a bounty of £26 14s. for each man. The figures ran thus:—

1st Majority	£2,000

	£22,850
Levy money allowed by Government for 1,064 men at £5 5s. each	5,586
	£28,436,

which being divided by 1,064, the number of men to be raised, produces a fund of £26 14s. per man.

On March 8, Cox and Greenwood wrote more minutely about the allocation of the money :—

> We think it necessary to mention to you that, excepting about one half of the levy money which will be issued from the War Office, there will be no other fund to ensure the various demands for the recruiting, but such as may arise from the deposits to be made by the several officers who are to obtain commissions in the corps; and that it will therefore be requisite as these gentlemen may be approved of by your Grace or by Lord Huntly that their respective proportions of the purchase money should be immediately lodged.
> The colonels of the other regiments proceed precisely upon this plan, being aware of the inconvenience which must otherwise be experienced in completing their respective corps.

On March 14, 1794, J. M[enzies?] pointed out to Cox and Greenwood that Lord Amherst had stated that levy money would be issued "at the rate of £5 for each man and the pay of the regiment from the date of the beating order to be allowed in aid of the recruiting" :—

> From this I should humbly conceive that his Grace and Lord Huntly were entitled to touch immediately the whole levy money at the above mentioned rate and three months' subsistence of the regiment. Otherwise where is the allowance held forth in aid of the recruiting?

Cox and Greenwood replied to this particular query on March 26:—

> About one half of the sum for levy money will be issued immediately . . . and this, together with the amount of the actual subsistence of the men will be all the Fund that can be obtained from Government towards the recruiting till the Regiment may have got half of the men, when all the remainder of the levy money will probably be issued.

The increment on the Government allowance varied with different regiments according to the state of the labour and the bounty market. Unfortunately for the Marquis, the increment was run up sometimes to four times the Government bounty by the acute recruiting rivalry of the 109th Regiment, which had captured the patronage of the Town Council of Aberdeen. The worst of the opposition fell upon Captain Finlason, who was conducting not only the financial affairs of the Northern Fencibles in Aberdeen, but the recruiting for the Gordons. As early as February 22, that is to say, within a month of the issue of the War Office mandate, Finlason wrote as follows:—

> I struggle hard to make a good bargain, but I may as well attempt to change the system of the whole army as to ask recruiting officers here to alter their terms; but I flatter myself no other party has done the same execution here in the same time, and I give you my word there have not been ten minutes passed this day without my knocker going to all fellows, drunk and sober.

On March 30 he made another plaint:—

> If friends to one Corps [Hay's] advertise gratuitys, the other, [the Marquis's], will find some to do so too. It becomes necessary in such a case and there is no help. It is inflaming the reckoning on both sides: but the Marquis will chuse to keep his ground I daresay.

The rivalry was felt in the country districts, for Gordon in Coynachie wrote on March 14:—

> If Colonel Hay's beating orders come to this country before the Marquis makes his appearance, it will knock our recruiting on the head. Every man that has any inclinations expects such high bounty money from him.

Digitized by Google

A similar difficulty faced the Duke's son-in-law, Sir Robert Sinclair, who listed ten drummers at Fort George. Writing to Menzies on March 19, he said :—

> Do let me know if the Marquis raises his bounty when he comes, as very fine lads laugh at 12 guineas. There is this day a beating order come to Campbelltown to inlist for Colonel Graham's corps at 18 guineas, and very fine lads [do] not stick at that. It has alarmed me much being near me. The drummers get no bounty, but I give them cloaths, almost to the amount of the King's [bounty].

Coynachie Gordon, in writing from Huntly, March 27, says :—

> You may as well suppose that we could remove Gordon Castle on our shoulders as get men without paying them their bounty down. They are so knowing with that line now.

It was essentially true of recruiting in those days that every man had his price, though we now have no data to decide why it differed. It was certainly not a mere matter of a change in the buyers, (that is to say, different recruiting officers), for the same officer is found paying a varying scale. Here are some of the figures selected as showing that the demand for bounties was widespread, and not conditioned by geography. For example, one would have thought that the Badenoch men, as fine specimens of Highlanders, would have been easy to recruit The list of bounties paid there, however, quickly dispels that idea. The following were some of the bounties paid to Badenoch recruits :—

This last figure, £15 15s., was ultimately fixed by the War Office, in a letter of February 21, 1795, as the limit for recruits enlisted for general service, "the high bounties offered to the new levies being judged extremely prejudicial to the recruiting for the navy;" but it may be doubted whether this by-law was strictly observed.

The total paid out for bounties in 1794 from the exchequer at Gordon Castle was £2478 12s. 5d., including

These figures, of course, do not include the men raised by other captains of companies, dealing only with those for whom the Marquis of Huntly was directly responsible. One wonders what has become of the balance-sheets of the other companies. It is probable, however, that they all would tell the same tale.

Besides these sums, a further amount of £560 12s. 2d. was paid out in bounties and expenses in 1797. We have no details of any precise addition to the regiment, although Colonel Greenhill Gardyne mentions a draft of recruits arriving at Gibraltar in April of that year. They were probably raised in response to the big territorial scheme which Dundas proposed (February 22, 1797). A second battalion was raised for the

Gordons in 1803 in response to the Army Reserve Act, by which 50,000 additional men were to be added to the army, by conscription, Scotland contributing 6000. This second battalion totalled 1113, but the only note of expense we have is the sum of £958 15s. 10d., paid between May 1 and Nov. 2 to the Forsyths of Huntly for clothing. A letter from the Forsyths, dated January 9, 1804, shews that the men "paid full value for their kilts."

In addition to bounties, the Marquis had sometimes to acquiesce in a quid pro quo, such as the following, which was propounded by James Gordon, who wrote from Croughly to Menzies on June 14 (1794):—

> I find Peter Gordon cannot prevaill on either of his younger broyrs. to go with the Marquis. In my presence he used all his endeavours to perswade his younger broyr. to goe, but to no purpose; and as that is the case, to please the Marquis, he will goe himself. He wishes to get possession of Ffourdmouth, as he has nothing to support his wife and two orphants, except the possession and small cover there, one which is reather greatly under burden, so that his wife, etc., cannot be supported without the possession in his absence: and in the event of his going he wishes if his friends can find anoyr. passable man to goe in his place some time hereafter to gett his discharge.

On June 15 the Marquis gave a bounty of £2 2s. to Gordon and £18 18s. to his wife. In some cases the relations had to be pacified. In this way the father of Neil M'Millan got £12 12s., while Neil himself got £8 8s., bringing up his price to £21.

Sometimes the quid pro quo was put forward on behalf of a community. Thus George Bell, writing from Coclarachie, March 26, 1794, speaks about the clothing of the regiment:—

> I think the profits of a Huntly regiment should be given to Huntly folks, and I hope you [John Menzies] are of the same opinion, and will on proper occasions say so.

Huntly himself clearly recognised this method of bargaining, for he wrote from Edinburgh, March 23, that "Forsyth should exert himself, as he is to have the shirts to make."

A frank admission of the difficulty of getting recruits, and the very different attitude of the recruiting authorities to-day, was forthcoming from Lieutenant M'Killigan, who wrote from Banff to Menzies, April 3, about a man John Joass :—

Digitized by Google

> I consider [him] a very excellent recruit. He was put into prison here suspected of things not of an agreeable nature, but, as times go, soldiers must be admitted whose character will not bear particular inquiry. Mr Forbes, the sheriff's substitute, has given me a preference, and in other respects been most ready and obliging as the getting the man liberated was attended with some difficulty. I have given him an order on you [Menzies] for his bounty of five guineas, and have also paid expenses on his imprisonment amounting to £3 7s. Add to this half a guinea I was obliged to promise one of the town's officers to endeavour to bring him to agree to enlist.

The Marquis in pursuit of men came into sharp collision with employers and their apprentices. A typical case is stated by Miss G. Gordon, who, writing to Menzies, March 2, says that a nineteen year old apprentice of Provost Robinson, Banff, had listed with the Seaforths, but on his indenture being produced he was given up :—

> But as Mr Robinson has had great trouble and been put to expense with this man, they have no objections to let him go to Lord Huntly for ten guineas, provided they can get eight guineas of the bounty in order to make up their loss. . . . [Men] do not like going to be killed, they say. I offered a fine handsome and stout young man twelve guineas, but no money would make him go.

Sometimes the masters were not averse from being paid off, for Alexander Black, blacksmith at Buckie, got £4 4s. for delivering up the indenture papers of James Wilson, who himself cost £10 10s.

Examples of other incidental expenses constantly occur, as for example :—

June 17.—To William Christie, wright, for his trouble and expenses in keeping a boy who came to enlist but was found to be diseased	£1	1 0
May 27.—To George Urquhart, for bringing his brother Donald, whose bounty was £19 19s.	£1	1 9

Digitized by Google

Even when he had captured his men, the Marquis had to humour them. In certain cases he even increased the bounty, as shown in the entry under date July 3—"To Donald Macpherson, enlisted on March 12, ordered by your lordship over and above £8 8s. formerly paid by Menzies, and £7 7s. at Aberdeen," the further sum of £5 5s., bringing up the price of Macpherson to £21. Everything seems to have been done to make the recruits as happy as possible, as these payments prove:—

June 4.—To A. Bayne, for playing the fiddle to the recruits at Gordon Castle ...	£0	17	6
June 15.—To William Gordon, of the New Inn, Aberdeen, for four hogsheads of porter for the recruits	16	10	0
July 1.—To A. Bayne and Robert Bremner, for playing the fiddle on February 7, May 24, June 20	£1	10	0
July 15.—To Peter Weir, in Bogs, price of bull, baited and roasted and given to the recruits	£3	15	0

Some of the recruits had little perquisites, as, for example, John Baxter, who got five shillings for "drummbeting" at two markets at Keith, two at Elgin, and one at Botriphnie. Drum beatings, however, were cheap, for only two shillings were paid for "diffrant" beatings at Fochabers from January 1 to April 29.

Examining the recruiting progress in the different centres, we find that Captain Finlason, stationed at Aberdeen, had probably the hardest task of anybody. On February 25 he told Menzies he was willing to do everything in his power in the "two fold business, but they are clashing circumstances and will operate against each other." In the first place, he was face to face with the fiercest element of the competition with the 109th, and in the midst of a people who were biassed in favour of his rival. Then he had to carry on his work without the personal help of the man chiefly involved, the Marquis of Huntly. One sees him hard at work in his office, which was apparently in his house, dashing off letters at night after his day's work to Menzies—now hopeful, now in the depths of despair. A clear idea of his moods will be got by a chronological arrangement of his varying sentiments:—

February 22.—I have been in the lower storey of my own house from morning to night, [but he found some compensation in having got five men]. The gentlemen have been striped [sic] to the buff —and critically inspected as men never were.

March 1.—I have had nibblers from morning to night of this day, and I think three have taken the bait. Monday is the first attesting day, so we do not count our chickens.

March 2.—I had a full parade in my court this morning, before they set off with pipe and drum for the display of a Friday.

March 3.—I am really much concerned that the Marquis does not come north instantly, as I cannot see how the material business of raising the regiment can be set going and put fairly on leg, but in this country under the Duke's influence, after his Grace has received all the necessary previous information to be collected by the Marquis on the spot and in the agents' power to communicate. It is obvious that Sir J[ames?] G[rant?], or any undertaker who has been at the fountain head and a disciple under agents so long and versant in the publick market and traffick of the day, must start with every advantage. To such a one, I am sure the undertaking a regiment is a profitable thing, independent of patronage.

March 11.—This day I engaged George Gordon from the Cabrach, late a tenant of the Duke. He was dislodged by Coinachie or Mr Bell, and says he has £48 due him on bills from good men for the stocking of his farm sold. He is a tight Light Infantry man, 26 [years of] age. But I had him to engage thro' many windings—(1) a recommendation to the Marquis to sollicit the Duke for his former task to him on or after his discharge from the army: (2) an application to you or Mr Bell for some tenement or bigging for his wife till his return: (3) promotion if he deserves it: besides (4) ten guineas bounty and three guineas to his pilot, Sergeant Reid. This hero of the Cabrach says he is highly related here [Aberdeen], viz., to the Rev. Mr Sheriffs and his brother, the advocate. To-morrow he goes in high dress with his sword by his side to announce his new profession.

March 24.—I got on very slowly in numbers here. Had it not been for the enterprises of a new corps, I had been about 40 strong, instead of 32 as I stand. Had the Marquis come among us long ago, it would have been above 100 men in his way taking the country all over. . . . Every gauger in Scotland is employed for [Graham of Balgowan]. So between that and the Hay Corps we are sadly off: and no Marquis to support.

March 30.—A damned cheat (I believe he is), W. Stewart, an old deer stalker of the Duke's, made me believe he could get men in the Cabrach, etc. I ventured 20s. with him, and he is returned a clean ship: wants more money, but he shall rather get a rope. Do you know this fellow or his character?

April 1.—[Colonel Hay beat up for the first time]. The town is in a roar. We shall catch nothing till it settles. Nothing less than 30 guineas is spoken of; so we must have patience. . . . A bounty from the County will soon be noticed for the Aberdeenshire Regiment. Lord Huntly's friends must equal it and not be outdone. For one emissary we have on foot, they have a hundred. The whole town is for them. We have no one to assist us. . . . For God's sake, lay every oar in the water. Secure all the Strathbogie men. The Aberdeenshire Regiment will be about your ears, if every friend of the Marquis does not act with heart and hand and stop at no bounty.

April 6.—All people here are acting for [Hay], and the connection made with Delgaty by his brother being second Major is powerful in Aberdeenshire. . . . I hear Pitfour and Allardyce assisted [Colonel Hay] strongly. He found great difficulty after he went to London.

April 14.—The whole town high and low are at work for the Aberdeen Regiment. To-morrow Hay gives a great dinner.

May 2.—The Gordon recruits in Aberdeen were being drilled by a sergeant major of the Northern Fencibles.

June 24.—The Marquis gave a dinner on Sunday to Sir Hector Munro, Lord Kintore, Lord Inverury, [the] Provost of Aberdeen for his great services, Colonel Hay, Colonel Morison, etc., etc., etc. The most of the company drank enough. . . . Eighty seven men were secured here, whose attestations I have, besides a world of trouble I had in and about them. My house [was] never empty for five weeks from nine in the morning to ten at night. It was like an alehouse or gin shop.

July 1.—I went to town the day before the last division of Lord Huntly's regiment marched, to settle my recruiting account, which was accurately done by Captain Gordon, paymaster. . . . I delivered 86 attestations, besides 2 pipers instructed. Major Erskine was present and was pleased to think my men cheap, tho' at 16 guineas each, all expenses included. They would have been much lower had it not been for a certain interference: but you will consider what opponents I had, and how the market was raised all at once, and many of the bringers would accept nothing less than three guineas per man. . . . The Marquis, after paying for my men, is £726 in pocket.

As in the case of the Northern Fencibles in the previous year, some of the tenants on the ducal estates took concerted action. The Aberdeen Journal of April 28 announced:—

At a meeting of some of the Duke of Gordon's tenants in the Parish of Kirkmichael and Strathdown, it was resolved, in testimony of their gratitude and attachment to the noble family under which they and their predecessors have lived for generations, to exert themselves to assist in enlisting volunteers for the Marquis of Huntly's regiment, and for that purpose they resolved to give three guineas of additional bounty over and above every other bounty, to any good recruit from their own country, who shall voluntarily enlist with the Marquis of Huntly, or with Captain John Gordon of Coynachie, or with any of the subscribers to the present bounty for his lordship's behoof; and they also resolved to give the same additional bounty to every good recruit from any other country who shall voluntarily enlist with James Gordon in Craughly [Croughly], Robert Macgregor in Delavorar, or William Stuart in Bellantruan, for the Marquis of Huntly's Regiment.

The hand of the Gordons must have been considerably strengthened by the Duke's appointment as Lord Lieutenant. Dundas wrote to him from Whitehall, May 14, 1794:—

His Majesty, having been pleased to appoint Lord Lieutenants and High Sheriffs for the different counties in Scotland, and having fixed upon your Grace for the execution of those offices in the county of Aberdeen, I think it proper to explain to you the object of these appointments. When I first advised his Majesty to adopt this measure, I had in contemplation the double object of defence against a foreign enemy and the preservation of internal tranquillity against any who, either in conjunction with foreign enemies or actuated by their own evil dispositions, might be inclined to disturb it.

The first of those objects is, I trust, already sufficiently provided for by the various levies of Fencible Corps, both horse and foot, which have been already raised or are now raising in consequence of the zeal and loyalty which has so conspicuously manifested itself in the different parts of Scotland, and, if any circumstance should occur to render any more general array of the County necessary, the powers vested in you by your Commission as His Majesty's Lieutenant will enable your Grace to regulate that array so as to give an effectual aid to the regular Force which might be employed in such an emergence. . . .

You will perceive that it has been likewise in contemplation to attend to the wishes of any towns upon the coast which may be desirous to arm for their local defence; and if any considerable towns, other than those upon the coast, should be desirous of forming from their respectable and loyal inhabitants volunteer corps, it is His Majesty's pleasure that you should receive such propositions and transmit them to his Majesty's consideration.

This appointment probably quickened the instinct of the family to fend for itself, for Sir Robert Sinclair of Stevenson, who had married the Marquis's sister, Lady Madelina Gordon, in 1789, joined the recruit hunt at this time. Sir Robert, who was Governor of Fort George, was in close touch with the whole military situation. He began his recruiting work at Huntly, as we learn from a letter, written on May 25, by John Gordon, Coynachie, to Menzies :—

The number of men certain enlisted at Huntly during the time Sir Robert and the Marquis was there altogether does not exceed ten, including the time Sir Robert went to Aberdeen. There [sic] names is [sic] as follows :—

M'Killican Mackie	} Enlisted by Sir Robert Sinclair.
Reynolds, John Hay, William	} Enlisted by Lord Huntly.

Shand	Miss Bisset's man. Lady Madelina has his attestation.
Brown, James	Enlisted by Knockespock.

Then Sir Robert turned to his native heath, where he had to face the formidable opposition to the Caithness Fencibles, just as Captain Finlason had had to struggle against the Aberdeenshire Regiment. Sir Robert was greatly aided in his work by his charming wife, (who outlived him by 54 years). He wrote some excellent letters on the progress of his work, from which the following are the most telling points :—

Murkle, June 1, to Menzies :—I begin my operations to-morrow. I understand my farmers have agreed to give me a man each, six in number. To-morrow, my estate of Murkle is to come in here, and I mean to try them, tho' the country I find much drained by the Fencibles. Tuesday, I go to another propperty at Brabster, where I am in hopes of success. Wednesday, the King's birthday, I give a hogshead of porter in the town of Thurso : may have an effect as I have published at the church doors this day. Thursday, I shall be active as possible about the parish of Ray, where I have propperty. Friday, I dine with the Caithness Fencibles. I think I have brought things more to a bearing between them and me than I could have expected and I make no doubt, if any man preferred high bounties they would assist me. Lord Caithness asked Lady M. and I to dine at the mess, Friday the market day, and Lady Caithness and some other ladies meet Lady M. On Friday last, I gave a glass of whisky to the Fencibles in the afternoon and all the officers attended my party in beating up. I got a most excellent recruit on the street, 5 ft. 6 inches, to begin with. Saturday next, I mean to dine with Mr Sinclair of Holbournhead, and then to go to Mr Innes of Sandside, near my propperty in the parish of Ray, where by being in the neighbourhood I may get a man to come in. I then go to Lord Caithness's and some other gentlemen.

here and the devil to pay with the Fencibles. I can hardly find a man to attest, let alone justice from the Justices of the Peace in the country. However, I have determined to yield to none of them. . . . My propperty has dissatisfied me very much by all the young men keeping back, but I would feign hope they will still come forward, as I have thro' some of tacksmen let them know my mind. But at the Thurso market and the King's birthday Lady M[adeline] and I have done a little. . . . I gave a hogshead of porter yesterday, and the Fencibles seem to be astonished we are doing so well.

June 19, 1794, to Menzies:—Tell Huntly my estate, like all others here, is much drained. I tryed to turn them out, but the young men ran to the hills. This happen'd to Lord Caithness and Sir John [Sinclair] likewise here: so it is pretty well what we have done. I regret much not having been sooner in the county.

Fort George, June 22, 1794, wrote to Menzies:—It gives Lady Madelina and I great pleasure to think the Marquis has been so successful. We arrived here at 12 o'clock at night the night before last, having made the most wonderful good passage from Caithness in a fishing boat ever known. We catched a good wind, and were in Caithness at Mr Sinclair's at half past three in the afternoon and here at 12 at night, which saved us four cursed tedious days' journeys. My success in Caithness was not quite up to my expectations as my farms did not turn out men: but I have excellent recruits. There is here 11 capitals [men]—one adjudged to me which I have advertised as a deserter in Caithness, having absconded: and one given against me by two justices, which, I am certain by the steps I have taken, is mine. . . . I had a dreadful hard drinking campaign, but am in perfect health notwithstanding. Tho' I have few men, I have the satisfaction to think my friend. Sir John Sinclair, did not get a man to the Fencibles from the day I entered the county till I left it. It is quite drained. If I had gone in two months ago, I was credably assured Sir John would have been puzled to get one man. The Fencibles were offering money to their officers to get off to go with Lady Madelina.

Sir Robert died at Fort George on August 4, 1795, and on August 16 Major Baillie wrote to Menzies:—

> I have to request that you may be so good as to acquaint the Duchess of Gordon, with my most respectful compliments, that I have done the utmost in my power to arrange for Sir Robert's recruiting business with the Caithness legion to the best advantage. All those that could be proved are to be transferred to the Marquis's regiment (5 in number).

The regiment was at last completed, and the recruits began to march on Aberdeen, which had been selected as the rendezvous, and still remains the depot of the regiment. A curious glimpse of the clannishness of some of the sections is borne out by the fact that when the Lochaber men started out for Gordon Castle on or about June 9, Baillie Cameron, of Gordonsburgh, accompanied them part of the way. He wrote on June 9:—

> They have to a man petitioned not to be sent with Captain Cochrane's countrymen, and indeed refused to go with them, as they are afraid they would get them a bad character by the road, and I have agreed to their request, in hopes that Lord Huntly will have no quarrell with them on that account. I had a compleat whisky meeting at Highbridge on Saturday with Mr Ross and all his neighbours. I am sorry to say that I got no attestations filled up there, but returned loaded with promises to be implemented at the market. What it may produce I know not.

In the end all difficulties were overcome, and the Marquis, or, rather, his helpers and servers, who lacked his easy-going philosophy, had the satisfaction of seeing the rival 109th obliterated within two years, by being drafted into another regiment, the 53rd. The Gordons were embodied, 750 strong, at Aberdeen on June 24, a red letter day in the military history of the north, for it was the date chosen for laying the foundation stone of the barracks on the Castle Hill, which remains to this day the depot of the regiment and still shelters the precious "description register" giving full particulars of the first men to enter the Gordons. The Marquis, attended by the Brethren of seven Lodges, the Magistrates, and everybody who was anybody, marched to the spot from Lodge Walk by Marischal Street, the Quay, and "up the hill by the new road," returning to the New Inn by North Street, Queen Street and Broad Street. The Aberdeen Journal of the day tells us that:—

> On this occasion there was the greatest concourse of people that has ever been known in this city. Wherever the procession passed all the windows, balconies, and streets were crowded; but, notwithstanding the vast multitude, and the hazardous situation of the Castlehill and the tops of the adjoining houses to which many were led by their curiosity, the whole concluded without the smallest accident happening to any person.

The regiment was reviewed next day by General Sir Hector Munro, who had been an officer in the Duke's first regiment thirty-five years previously, and set out at once for Fort George, where on July 8, 9, and 10 it embarked with the second battalion of the 78th Regiment and the Inverness-shire Highlanders for Southampton, which was reached on August 16. The Journal of the period, in recording the embarkation, tells this delicious story :—

> The men went on board in the highest spirits. The Marquis of Huntly, who may boast of one of the finest bodies of men in the service, embarked with them. He showed an alacrity of service by jumping into the first boat, and so great was the eagerness of his men to follow their noble commander, that the boat had nearly been overset; and the air resounded with cheers from those left on the beach until his lordship was on board the transport. Every man appeared to be perfectly sober, an Irish gentleman excepted [there were 53 Irishmen in the regiment], who swore by J— that though he was half-seas over already, he would not quit the land without a quid of tobacco!

The transports set sail on July 18, and passed Aberdeen, which must have been on the outlook for them, on the evening of July 21. The regiment was not to set foot again in Scotland for eight years.

The Gordons sailed from Southampton on September 5 for Gibraltar, which they reached on September 26. We get a glimpse of the life on the Rock from a letter written from Gibraltar on November 21, 1794, by Gordon in Coynachie, who was not an easy man to please :—

> There cannot be a worse place for a paymaster. He cannot get a farthing but the greatest risk of loosing by the meanness the troops are kept and the damn'd coin, that is perhaps not two days of the same value. Everything is dear but wine, which the 100th Regiment takes a good spell of sometimes.

From Gibraltar it went to Corsica, June 11, 1795. The Marquis sailed for England on December 20, 1795, but when three days out his ship was captured by a French privateer, and he did not reach England till September, 1796. This was the month in which the regiment left Corsica, and by a remarkable coincidence one of the four transports, the Granby, in which it sailed to Gibraltar was captured by a Spanish vessel, with two staff officers, three sergeants and 48 rank and file. This affair, however, was counterbalanced a little later by an incident hitherto unpublished. It is recorded in a memorial which Alexander Phimister sent to the Marquis of Huntly on October 17, 1797 :—

> In the year 1794 your petitioner inlisted in your lordship's regiment. Upon June 21, 1796, your petitioner had the misfortune to lose his eyesight, and on September 1, 1796, he was ordered for Giberalter [from Corsica], where I was ordred for England. And on the passage coming to England wee fell in with a Spanish brig, and captured her by Captain Puget; and when we come to England she was estimate at £15,000 stg. All our names was inserted in the prize list, which my name was along with the others aboard. But I have gott none of the money as yeat. May it therefore please your lordship to take the above premesses into your consideration, and see if you'l be pleased to do for your petitioner so as he may have his proportionable part of the prize money.

The regiment arrived in England again on May 15, 1798, and was at once sent to Dublin. During its stay in Ireland it became immensely popular, not only with the people but with other troops. In January, 1800, a memorial was presented to the Marquis Cornwallis, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, from the Protestant non-commissioned officers and men of the Glengarry Regiment to the number of 300, offering to serve the King as "a distinct battalion or as a battalion with any other regiment in any way that may be conducive to the service in any part of the British Dominions (East and West Indies excepted), and the only reward we ask for so doing is that we will be commanded by our late Lieutenant-Colonel, Charles Maclean, etc." M'Lean and the officers, writing from Nenagh, January 15, 1800, expressed to the Marquis of Huntly the wish to be attached to his regiment in the event of Government's accepting their new services, and asking him to apply to the Duke of York and to Cornwallis for permission. Huntly replied on January 29 from Gordon Castle accepting the offer gladly so far as he was concerned.

On April 2, 1800, four privates of the North Lowlands Fencible Foot—William Anderson, John Thomson, Malcolm M'Lean and James Angus, all belonging to Huntly—wrote from Down Patrick to the Marquis that they wished to join the line :—

> We have volunteered our services the second time in order to be under your lordship's command, but we have been taken no notice of. We therefore hope your lordship will be so good as to do all in your power for us, as we have been so bold as to write to H.R.H. the Duke of York concerning your lordship's regiment. My lord, we think it very hard to see our native country in such danger from foreign arms, and so many young lads only waiting the favourable opportunity to serve His Majesty when the greatest danger appears, only with the choice of your regiment. We have had the offer of a volunteer bounty for 12 or 14 guineas to be taken as Riflemen agreeable to the Duke of York's orders : in consequence of which, there is about 120 turned out, and if there was any encouragement given by our officers, the strength and pick of our regiment would follow the example of their comrades. As we are all Scotchmen, we would wish to be distinguished as such.

One can thoroughly understand the point of the petition, for the Marquis was personally very popular. Grant Stewart tells a story in illustration of this :—

> Among the candidates who pleaded for a commission [in 1794] was a young man, who, as far as his face was concerned, was not recommended by their Graces, being dark and swarthy, and much disfigured by the smallpox. The Marquis being particular as to the personal appearance of his officers, the candidate was humourously told of his disqualifications; but, nothing daunted by the rebuff, he was determined to accompany the Gordon Highlanders as a volunteer. One day as the Marquis was making an inspection of the regiment in line, his sharp eye rested on a figure dressed in the Highland garb, smart bonnet, and staff in hand, who took his place at the end of the line. The inspection being over, his lordship sent for the volunteer, and a conversation to the following effect, as we are told on good authority, took place between his lordship and his follower: "Well, Grant, pray what have you come here for?" "Just to be a soldier, my lord," answered the volunteer. "Oh, don't you know that you are too ugly for a soldier?" said his lordship. "Maybe I am, my lord, but perhaps I may be of use in frightening the French." "Well, well, poor fellow," said the Marquis, "as you are determined to smell gunpowder, you must be humoured in your wish." The ready mother wit displayed by the volunteer in his interview with the Marquis so pleased his lordship, that he soon became a commissioned officer and favourite of his lordship, who found much amusement in his strong good sense and caustic vein of humour.

The Marquis seems also to have looked after promising privates, for there is a receipt at Gordon Castle, dated September 7, 1798, for the school fees (seven shillings) which he paid to Mr Lorimer for Duncan Macdonald, a private of the regiment. An illustration of the popularity of the Gordon family appears in an (undated) memorial which was sent by George Catto, "now under sentence of seven years' transportation on board the 'Prudentia,' hulk, at Woolwich," to the Duke of Gordon, as follows:—

Your Grace's unfortunate petitioner is a native of Rhynie. When young in life, he took a shop in the town of Huntly, where he continued a leather merchant until the beginning of the French war. Having drawn large sums at the office of Mr George Davidson on a tanner in Dundee, he became bankrupt, and the drafts in course came back on him. The drawer made him fail in business and come into this nation. He lived one year with a Scotch drover at Woodford in Essex, after which he engaged himself into His Majesty's Royal Laboratory, Woolwich, where he continued until the day he came by the misfortune he is here for, which was for driving away three Scotch heifers off Epping Forest. He was tried at Chelmsford gaol the 17th day of July, 1795, and cast for death before Alexander M'Donald, Lord Chief Baron: but by the letters from His Majesty's foreman at the works at Woolwich, I was respited for seven years' transportation. He had a letter dated 3rd of May from your Grace's factor at Cocklarachy, assuring him that he had wrote to London to her Grace to endeavour to get him a conditional pardon to serve his Majesty in Army or Navy, which letter he sent accompanied by a petition to her Grace the 21st day of May. Your Grace's petitioner most humbly intreats of you to take this unhappy situation under your eye, so that by your great interest he may be once more released from the chains of bondage and slavery and be enabled to regain the character he has lost, by standing in defence of his most Gracious Sovereign and Country; and then shall have reason to bless you till the last moment of his breath.

The regiment received its baptism of fire in Holland, losing heavily between Bergen and Egmont-op-Zee on October 2, 1799. Colonel Greenhill Gardyne has gone elaborately into this episode in the Walcheren expedition, which the Duchess with a sound historic sense afterwards described as "that fatal crusade" (Add. MSS. 37282, f. 123). The figures in the return as preserved at Gordon Castle differ, however, from those in "The Life of the Regiment" (i., 72-75).

Gordon M'Hardy, an ensign who was killed, was the son of the late John M'Hardy and his wife Mary M'Donell, residing at Kingussie. She had been left with no money and six children, and the Marquis of Huntly had taken her eldest boy as a cadet. In December, 1799, she sent a petition to the Marquis asking for help. Huntly himself was rather severely wounded, and the bullet was not extracted till seven years afterwards. The Aberdeen Journal of April 16, 1806, records the circumstances:—

On Tuesday, the 8th inst., the Marquis of Huntly had a considerable attack of fever, accompanied with severe pain, in that part of his back, where suspicion lay, that an extraneous body was lodged. This hourly increased, and a considerable fluctuating tumour made its appearance. On pressure, a hard substance was felt, which pointed out the necessity of its removal. Accordingly, in the forenoon of Friday, the 10th, a simple incision was made into the tumour, and along with fully three ounces of purulent matter, a broken piece of leaden bullet was discharged, ragged in its surface, and pointed at one end, about the size of a small raisin flattened. His Lordship bore the operation with his well known fortitude; and it must be very pleasing to all ranks of people to know that this noble gallant officer, who has so long suffered violent attacks of pain from having bled in his country's cause, has now every prospect of a complete recovery; but with a heart still ardent to expose himself again to danger when his services are required. Let Britain have confidence when she has such sons.

By April 23, Huntly had so far recovered as to be able to "take an airing in his carriage."

The regiment was not long idle, for it sailed for the east on August 30, 1800, touching at Malta (December 1—January 2 or 3) on the way. While here, Coynachie Gordon sent a letter to the Marquis on December 18:—

I wrote your lordship from Tetuan Bay, respecting an exchange on half pay 'twixt Major Honyman and me. He was very anxious to know if it could be accomplished. It is by no means of being tired of the army, affraid of service or climate that I would wish it, but merely from the situation of my family. However, if your lordship could procure an exchange with any person that would pay the difference, but without making any stipulations, I authorise your lordship to make any agreement you think eligible. I would give a 100 guineas that Honyman could be brought in for it. There can be no reason for refusing him, but being older in the army than Napier. I confess he is young, but Colonell Erskine puts it on the footing that he had pledged himself to the captains that he would never allow it: which you must see is a very lame excuse, as it does not interfere with their promotion in any degree, and I'm certain it is not for the regard for myself or service that he did not part with me. It is impossible to sell out on account of Captain Cameron, and

I have refused to do it for various reasons. The utmost request I have to ask your lordship in case of accidents is to get the pension and allowance from Government settled on my wife and family. . . . [Malta] would be as safe [as] to be taking a wee drapy of Miss Mellis's bottle at Strabogy.

Almost the only other document of interest at Gordon Castle after this date is another letter written to Menzies by Coynachie, now a major, from Colchester, August 3, 1804:—

We expect the French over every day. I don't know if you have any fears or dread of them in Scotland. I wish to God we had peace on some terms, or other. I am perfectly tired of the service, and what makes it so disgusting to one who has served so long as I have done and purchased everything is, altho' Col. Robertson is to be placed on half pay, I find that I will not succeed to the promotion. I sent a memorial to the Duke of York to that effect but received an answer from his R.H. secretary, saying that Col. Robertson would be replaced by one from the hlaf pay. I wish the Marquis would stir them up about it. I would take your advice and sell out altogether, but it is an improper time to ask it just now when the enemy is expected, and were you in my situation you would think it extremely hard to sell for the regulation, and that I would not get at present. I do not believe I could sell the company. The 2nd battalion is so much against the sale of commissions. If I could obtain leave to sell and name a successor, I could get just 4000 guineas for the majority. Do you think if this campaign was over, would the Duke give his interest along with the Marquis of Huntly to get me leave to sell without restriction? If I do not quit the service, I must unavoidably give up farming. Its a perfect drudgery on Mrs Gordon and the same time a loosing bargain.

The career of the regiment in war belongs to the history of the Nation rather than of the Family: but, if the lid of the Gordon charter chest closes here, it must not be forgotten that the Gordon Highlanders still bear the crest of the house which raised them—a striking, if rare, reminder of feudal times, when all our army was equipped by the great landlords, as a sort of rent for the broad acres which the King entrusted to their keeping.

THE MUSTER OF 1794.

The Gordon Highlanders are peculiarly fortunate in possessing as they do an elaborate register ("Description Book") of all the first recruits to the regiment in 1794. The history of the preservation of regimental records is altogether lamentable. An absurd custom has permitted regiments to keep their own records: the absurdity resulting from the fundamental fact that the soldier's business is destruction and not preservation: that his life is essentially nomadic. The real repository of such records is the Register House, Edinburgh, or the Public Records Office, London, which are fully equipped for the preservation of documents. Fortunately, however, the Gordons have preserved their first Description Book, and it is here printed for the first time.

The transcript was made in October, 1907, by Mr John Milne, LL.D., to whom a debt of gratitude is due by military students for his laborious work. It was intended to be presented as a supplement to "Gordons under Arms," issued by the New Spalding Club. That book, however, proved too large for the inclusion of the register.

The Description Book is a large folio, in an excellent state of preservation, at Castlehill Barracks, Aberdeen. It contains (1) the recruit's name; (2) the date of his attestation; (3) his age; (4) his height; (5) the colour of his eyes and complexion; (6) his birthplace; (7) his trade; (8) his fate. The register is arranged alphabetically, as conditioned by the date of attestation. Thus in the "A's," James Allardice comes first because he 'listed on March 5; while James Allan comes last because he 'listed in June. For the sake of easy reference I have rearranged this (omitting the colour of the eyes entry) on strict alphabetical lines. The register contains several entries relating to enlistments in 1795 and subsequent years. Confining oneself to 1794, one finds that 879 men 'listed in 1794, the rate of progress being:—

Feb.	March.	April.	May.	June.
33	204	249	269	87 men

leaving 37 for the other months of that year. Col. Greenhill Gardyne made a rough survey of the list in his "Life of a Regiment" (i., 16). I have made my own calculations (a laborious process), confining myself to the year 1794. It will be seen that the overwhelming number (539 to be exact) of the recruits were born north of the Grampians, and that every county in Scotland except Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk, contributed men. The list shows that the Gordon Highlanders were really far more highland than the family of Gordon itself, which is "highland" only by environment, having come from the Borders:—

Digitized by Google

245 Inverness	8 Fife	53 Ireland
118 Aberdeen	8 Nairn	9 England:—
77 Banff	7 Linlithgow	Cumberland
58 Lanark	6 Dumfries	Falmouth
38 Stirling	5 Elgin	Gloucestershire
37 Midlothian	5 Forfar	Gravesend
33 Argyll	4 Kincardine	Newcastle
26 Caithness	3 Dumbarton	Portsmouth
25 Moray	3 Haddington	Southampton
23 Renfrew	3 Peebles	Stafford
21 Perth	2 Wigton	Yorkshire
20 Ross	1 Bute	3 Wales
15 Ayr	1 Kinross	1 Germany
14 Clackmannan	1 Orkney
14 Sutherland

There are 357 different surnames in the list, of which 247 begin with the prefix Mac. The more important are as follows:—

39 Macdonald	15 Mackay	8 Campbell
35 Macpherson	13 Macmillan	8 Ferguson
35 Cameron	12 Maclean	7 Anderson
18 Stuart	12 Mackenzie	7 Forbes
16 Gordon	11 Mackintosh	7 Grant
15 Fraser	11 Smith	7 Macgregor

Almost one-half of the men were unskilled artisans, being described vaguely as "Labourers." It will be observed that there was a great dearth of trades in the Highlands; most of the artisans belonged to the southern part of the country. The occupations of the recruits were:—

Statisticians will be able to draw many morals from the list. The average height of the Gordon recruits was 5 ft. 3⅔ in.; in 1911, the average height of recruits in the British Army, excluding those under 18, was 5 ft. 6·2 in.; that of 1901-1910 was 5 ft. 6·1 in. Only five men were six ft. or over, namely, William Black, Kintore; Robert Ferguson, Cumberland; Alexander M'Gregor, Laggan; George Shanks, Glasgow (6 ft. each); and George Smith, Kilmarnock, 6 ft. 2 in. The Highlanders were a good deal smaller than men from the south. Several little boys joined.
